LYCEUM LECTURE . "MONEY." We have beaute radii dat our orgent request to make a few extracts from this very interesting Address, delivered before the Lyceum, on Tuesday exening last, by John Appleton, Esq. of this city, on the subject of "Mongy."

Mr. Appleton commences by observing that it ig the interest of society to increase to the highcat point of augmentation, its productive ener-

Production, at the maximum, the interest of society requires that the largest possible number or individuate enould equally partake of what has thus been produced. Increased production, extended and equalized distribution are the unfailing proofs of national properity. The investigations of political economy, regularly interseting in themselves, acquire an immensureably ingreased importance, when it is borne in mind, that the social enjoyments of all orders, and dedigarberen ... weite di- mithed, noordingly as the government is administered in accordance with, or in opposition to its lawer-

In the multiplied relations of modern civilization, there is no agent, whose functions are more important and interesting, and perhaps less understood, than those of Money, and yet important as are its functions -- necessary and indispensible, as it is, to the very existence of all domestic and foreign connicional relations, perkaps it may be with truth soid, that, we are hardly aware of its importance its benefits, or of the impetus it has given to social progress. Man even in the rudest state, is not the arti-licer of all which he requires for use. He de pends for much on exchange with others: La the primitive forms of society that exchange is necessarily direct and immediate. There is no middle man and no common instrument of exchange, through whose intervention, the mutual transfer of commodities is effected. The difficulty, which at the outset occurs, is to find some one, who wishing for some article, which the seller has to dispose of, can at the same time supply his want by some article of which he is the possessor and which he is anx ious to dispose of in return for the article offered.- The owner of a boat and the owner of-a horse meet one wishing for the article, which the other has at his disposal, but being unable to supply the wants of the other with any article in his power, no exchange enques. Each may wish to dispose of what he has, but not wighing for what the other has no trade is made

The mere possession of value and the wish to disnove of the same, will not suffice to effect a purchase or an exchange. Further conditions ese indispensibly necessary to every exchange, that the individuals who are parties to it should each reciprocally degire that which the other offers in exchange and wish to dispose of thet which the other seeks to obtain.

Lis therefore desirable to fix on some common article possessed of values capable of subdivision to any extent which should alike be desired by all- because it is that which all wish to purchase, since with it, whatever is vendible, can be purchased. Such an article, whatever it may be, being agreed upon, a great saving at ones is at effected. . A long time will elapse before society will determine, that there shall be any instrument of exchange, or what that instrument shall be. It will not so determine till long after it shall have emerged from the barbarism of its incipient existence. Indeed, long after society has made its first advances, and government has become fixed and stable, we still find it without any instrument of exchange. But whatsoever be the material composing it, of barter. Were gold and silver offered for exchange, uncoined, in the state of bullion, as is still the case in Burmah and in many other parts of the world, it would at once be admitted that it is anly the exchange of so much metal for so much of any other article. The stamp of: government produces no alteration. All that it doés or can do, is to athix a name, and deterand superscription of Ceasir it may be or of Napoleun the bird of Jove and of Liberty, the castellated arins of Spain, or the double-headed eagle of imperial despotism. But the head of the sovereign, the impress of the eagle, or the devices of he herald alter not the nature of the subject. It is still a trade of barter. Gold and silver are just as much bought and sold as any other article, which is the subject matter of traffic. All you can say is, that they are commodities more generally in demand as articles of traffic than any other, bg. cause by their introduction you snoner arrive at at the object of desire as by the rail road you more rapidly gain the wished for goal, than by any other conveyance.

Exchangeable value, is the expression of the elation between the supply of, and the demand for any article, at the time and place of such expression. As all goods are exchanged for money their value is thus expressed. Price then is the expression in dollars and cents, of the retime and place, bears to gold or silver, express ed in dollars and cents. But gold and silver, though constituting the instrument of exchange, and though used in its various monetary denominations to express nrice, is not itself the measure of value. Value has no invariable measure. It is impossible to find a measure of value which shall at all times bear the same invariable relation to the thing to be messured. > tive value is affected thereby. These results of general reasoning are abundantly verified from the history of the precious metals. The relation between gold and silver, and every article-of consumption in other words, the money price; will be found to have materially changed during the lapse of a few centuries, through the influx of the precious metals consequent upon the discovery of America. The effact of that increase of the metals will be made more strakingly apparent by recurring to a few instances of money prices be-
